

Directors' College at Stanford Law School

2010-06-20

Now in its 16th year, Stanford Law School Directors' College brings together leading CEOs, directors, jurists, scholars, and regulators for a rigorous and balanced examination of corporate governance, strategy and compliance at a venue that has become the premier program for director education.

Directors' College is an intensive two-day program for directors and senior executives of publicly traded firms. This curriculum addresses a broad range of problems that confront modern boards, including the board's role in setting business strategy, executive compensation, techniques for controlling legal liability, the challenge posed by activist investors, and dramatic new changes in the rules governing the election of corporate directors. The program is designed to generate practical "takeaway" pointers that can be responsibly applied to a broad range of boardroom concerns. William McLucas will be speaking on June 22, 2010 during The SEC's Enforcement Agenda panel.
